

CIBC Volunteers Take Financial Literacy to Chicago Schools

CHICAGO, October 31, 2019 – Recognizing the power of working together to make a difference, more than 400 CIBC volunteers visited 17 Chicago schools supported by Big Shoulders Fund to teach important lessons in financial literacy as part of its eighth-annual All-Team Volunteer Day.

CIBC believes strongly in the important role good financial skills play in helping individuals and families succeed and is committed to improving financial literacy in all the communities it serves.

“CIBC focuses its annual volunteer event on bringing easy-to-understand financial literacy lessons to the classroom,” said Michael G. Capatides, Senior Executive Vice-President and Group Head, CIBC U.S. Region, and President and CEO, CIBC Bank USA. “Our team is passionate about making a difference in our communities. We want to help these students learn smart money habits while they are young so they can make good financial decisions as adults. The work we do in the classrooms is a complement to the programs we provide to adults, such as knowing the meaning of your credit score and first-time homebuyer education.”

CIBC partnered with Big Shoulders Fund for the eighth year in a row to bring the Money Savvy Generation program to students.

“We appreciate CIBC’s continuing commitment to help ensure our students are ready for future success,” said Joshua Hale, President and Chief Executive Officer, Big Shoulders Fund. “Some of our schools have participated in the program since its inception, meaning our eighth graders have completed the full curriculum. We have seen them grow in their financial literacy confidence over the years. The program helps them to be more fiscally responsible, and has led to conversations with their families spreading the reach of these financial literacy lessons to the broader school communities as well.”
